

New Directions in Cognitive Linguistics

First UK Cognitive Linguistics Conference

October 23rd - 25th, 2005, Brighton, UK

Within the last 25 years or so, Cognitive Linguistics has emerged as a radical and exciting new approach to the study of language and the mind within the interdisciplinary project known as Cognitive Science. In that time a rich and relatively mature set of theories has developed which have by now been applied to a wide range of linguistic and cognitive phenomena. As Cognitive Linguistics has grown and matured, debates have emerged regarding foundational theoretical positions and data collection practices and methodologies. Moreover, in recent years, both the empirical basis and the interdisciplinary character of Cognitive Linguistics have been significantly strengthened. The purpose of this international conference is to take stock of the major achievements associated with Cognitive Linguistics since its emergence, and to provide a forum for examining new directions. The conference will also see the inauguration of the UK Cognitive Linguistics Association. There will also be a collection of peer-reviewed papers published based on the conference theme.
